

GOLF DIGEST'S BIENNIAL LIST OF THE MOST TALENTED

INSTRUCTORS UNDER 40 (2023-2024)

ILLUSTRATION BY PETER CROWTHER

WHAT DOES IT TAKE to be one of the Best Young Teachers in America? Golf knowledge? People skills? Influence on social media? Long hours on the range? Sure, those things help, but there's no one formula. The only exact commonalities of the instructors on this list are that they're all under 40, and they all have a real knack for making golfers better. ▶ In 2008, when our biennial list debuted, we identified 20 teachers in their 20s and 30s who were worthy of recognition. Our latest group of winners stands at 160, and their teaching locations stretch from Hawaii to New Hampshire. Some coach at exclusive places such as Baltusrol and L.A. Country Club. Others spend their days teaching indoors on simulators. ▶ Here we will reveal their names and give you a taste of their abilities as some of them share quality practice tips. These are Golf Digest's Best Young Teachers.

Straighten your curveballs with your hands

BY GREG DUCHARME

● The same features built into hybrids to help average players get shots airborne and avoid slicing can induce hard hooks for better players. This drill can help you take the left side out of play. Take a medium-sized ball and hold it in front of you with your hands on either side. Having your hands separated will make it easier to feel where they are relative to each other. Now make a backswing and get your lead hand on top of the ball (above).

Do the same in your swing and your lead arm will be higher and the face will be in a square or slightly open position. The more you exaggerate the lead hand on top, the more you'll promote a fade. If you're a slicer, set your trail hand at the top so your palm is facing away from you—like a free-throw shooter. That promotes a closed clubface.

Hit your pitches like you're tossing a ball

BY LINDY LABAUVE

● Growing up, I played softball and a number of other sports, which I use to cross-train my students so they have a better understanding of the swing and feel required to hit certain shots. Take a soft pitch shot. Unlike a full swing, it requires more finesse than speed. I'll have students take a golf ball and toss it underhand at the flagstick (below). I ask them to picture the ball flight, where they want the ball to land, and how much it rolls out. I also have them note what their throwing hand is doing—it should be more quiet and not flip much, just like when hitting a pitch shot. By practicing these tosses, I find that when it comes time to execute short shots, they're less concerned about technique and thinking about 15 other things, because the focus changes to what they want the ball to do. They're also able to better calibrate the length of their arm swing and the speed needed to hit the ball the right distance.

LINDY LABAUVE is the director of instruction at the Westin Kierland Golf Club in Scottsdale.

Learn to skim, not dig, in greenside bunkers

BY MATT WILSON

● As you probably know, the goal in a greenside bunker isn't to hit the ball; it's to swing through the sand under the ball. If you understand that concept, you're off to a good start in getting the ball on the green. But nearly as important is understanding how deep your club needs to travel through the sand under the ball. The answer? Not much. You want your wedge to skim the sand as you swing through impact. Any deeper than that—a common amateur issue—and you'll struggle to control the force of the shot and the distance the ball travels.

Here's a three-part drill to improve your sand shots. First, stick a tee in the sand so half of it is submerged. Then make swings trying to clip the tee. Next, place a ball on a tee that's submerged in the sand (left). Now try to clip the tee under the ball, which will pop the ball out like a bunker shot. The final step is to place a ball in the sand and imagine there still is a tee under it. Hit shots trying to clip that imaginary tee out from under the ball. This will give you a great feel for how to let your wedge glide—and not dig—through the sand. You can even take this swing thought to the course.

MATT WILSON is the director of instruction at Baltusrol Golf Club in Springfield, N.J.

Toss your slice in a bucket

BY DAN CARRAHER

● My teaching philosophy is that whoever is doing the work is the one who's learning. Instead of prescribing drills that help steer my students into the correct positions, I choose ones that force them to work harder to get into the right spots. I use resistance to create awareness of what their bad tendencies are, so they're more incentivized to fix them. That's how the fastest learning is done.

For my slicer students who struggle with an overly flat, inside takeaway, I place an empty range bucket over the top of their clubhead. As they make practice backswings, the weight of the basket discourages them from pulling the clubhead to the inside. If they do that, they're going to dump the bucket. To keep it in place, you need to rotate your forearms less during the takeaway and keep the clubhead and bucket just in front of your hands on a more vertical plane (above).

If you normally whip the club inside, this drill will be difficult at first. Once you get it, the club should feel lighter and easier to swing when you go back to hitting shots. You will be in a better position to swing down from inside the target line and avoid a slice.

DAN CARRAHER runs the Dan Carraher Golf Academy in St. Augustine, Fla.

Take the fear out of shots over water

BY JOHN MONTGOMERY

● I get it. When you have to carry a water hazard, it's hard to turn your brain off and not think about all of the previous times you drowned your golf ball. You might even resort to grabbing a "water-hole ball" as a precaution.

The reality is, those who revisit failures in their mind are doomed to repeat them. You need to change the script and send your brain a different message. The next time you're on the practice tee, imagine there's a water hazard between you and whatever target you choose (below). Stand directly behind your ball, and pick a target off in the distance. (If you're someone who likes to curve the ball, choose a starting point and a finishing point.) Now visualize the trajectory and shape of the shot over and over until it's perfectly clear. Once you address the ball, spend no more than five seconds over it before swinging away.

Work on this routine again and again with the goal of visualizing the desired outcome. Fairly soon the process of carrying a hazard will be easier than you could ever imagine, and you can chuck those water-hole balls for good!

Pivot like a pro

BY JARUT PADUNG

● While it's important for me as a teacher to guide you through the right positions, it's just as vital that you understand how to move your body to get in those spots. Without fluid dynamics, you'll get stuck or tend to get to the right positions too slowly.

I use the following drill with golfers who struggle with the proper sequencing of the swing. First, grab a club and address a ball with an alignment stick under your trail foot's heel (right heel for righties). Lift the clubhead over the ball and swing it forward about a foot toward your target (top photo, above).

Now make a backswing while applying pressure on the stick with your trail foot. Finally, shift pressure back into your lead foot as you swing down and hit the ball.

Why start with the club in front of the ball? It adds some flow to your swing. You're more likely to make a fuller, deeper hip turn, and it makes it easier to shift into your lead foot in the downswing. When your swing is more fluid, you can increase your clubhead speed with a lot less effort.

Cash in on your putts

BY ALANA SWAIN

● Feedback and consistency—those are my two buzzwords for practice. Without feedback, how are you going to know if you're doing something right? You can make a not-so-good swing on the range and still hit a good shot. For lasting improvement, you need to practice with feedback.

One putting exercise with tons of feedback is this drill using tees. Get yourself some two-toned balls or color one side on some white ones. Set up about six feet from a hole and stick two tees in the turf on either side of the ball, slightly wider than the width of your putter. Practice hitting the center of the face without hitting either tee, which produces an end-over-end roll with almost no sidespin or wobble. The two-toned ball will help you see this steady movement. Next, add a tee 12 inches behind the ball to help control the length of your backswing. Finally, form a narrow gate along your starting line and see if you can roll the ball pure through the gate (below). Move around the hole repeating the drill, so you can experience different breaks.

If you're able to get the ball rolling end over end without hitting the five tees, you'll build a reliable stroke that starts the ball on the line you choose.
